David Dudley Field of New York was perhaps the leading exponent of codification in the United States. In 1848 the so-called Field code was adopted in New York. This code attempted to recognize and simplify procedural law. A proposed codification of substantive law was not enacted. Perhaps due to the failure of New York to accept the latter code, the general codification movement was limited in the United States, although procedural codes were adopted in many other states.

The American Law Institute (ALI), a group of legal scholars, has been responsible for the most recent codification movement in the United States. The ALI has written restatements of law for such areas as contracts, torts, and conflict of laws. The restatements do not have the force of law, but they are used by states as models for codification, and courts refer to them in judicial decisions.

The twentieth-century codification impulse also found an outlet in the American Law Institute's Restatement project. The ALI, founded in 1923, hoped to alleviate the problems of legal uncertainty and complexity by setting forth the fundamental principles of the entire common law in a logically ordered format. Although the Restatement

It was not always so. In the nineteenth century, codification represented a democratic movement for access to justice-for reforming the legal system so that laypersons could not only understand, but operate, the machinery of law. In its strongest form, it presented a direct threat to the legal profession, to judicial Intensely interested in reforming the law, Hoffman was an early supporter of the codification movement and urged the adoption of Bentham-like codes as a means of establishing a unique American system of law. In 1846 Hoffman also proposedto begin anew his efforts to teach law using his methodology. Curiously he planned to run the schoolnot as a university effort but as a more traditional, apprentice like program.
